Minimally invasive treatment of renal artery stenosis by laser angioplasty: follow-up at a mean of 20.6 months. Forty-nine patients with angiographic renal artery stenoses (70% or greater) at a mean of 20.6 months after percutaneous transluminal angioplasty (PTA) were examined with digital subtraction angiography and duplex scanning to determine the long-term effectiveness of PTA. The overall follow-up was 76.5% at 20.6 months. There were five failures in 37 lesions (10.8%): three patient deaths (7.4%), one further patient death, and one amputation for nonfunctioning kidney. Of the 42 successfully treated renal arteries by PTA, stenoses were restenosed in 3 (7.3%) and failed in four (9.5%); stenoses were treated by repeat PTA in three (7.3%) and surgery in one (2.4%). In this relatively low-risk group of patients with atherosclerotic renal artery stenoses, PTA appears to be an effective initial treatment modality for symptomatic renal artery stenoses and can be successfully modified by repeat PTA in selected cases.
